the legal context in which restorative practice operates

This course provides a safe and secure environment to learn the practical skills that are needed to become a trained restorative practitioner.

You'll learn the main different approaches to dealing with harm and offending, the ethics informing restorative practice and the role of the practitioner in different stages of the restorative process.

Course details

This training has two stages, together totalling five credit points under Scottish Credit Qualifications and Framework (SCQF) as assessed by Napier University.

- > The first stage comprises of days one and two, focusing on conflict – its causes, how you and other people respond, management styles and conflict analysis and skills.
- > For the remaining three days, the focus is on learning and practising skills of a restorative practitioner such as summarising facts and feelings, identifying and dealing with potential risks of re-traumatisation and managing power imbalances.

Learning outcomes, teaching and assessment

This qualification develops your learning in four main areas:

- > Responding to and managing the different needs of persons harmed and persons responsible;
- > Autonomously managing the restorative meeting;
- > Autonomously managing a restorative intervention;
- > The reasons for the effectiveness of a restorative approach in repairing harm and addressing harmful behaviour together with its limitations.
